What is already known about this subject?

Incidence of depression is higher in people who are overweight or obese. There is no specific guidance in the UK on preferred first-line antidepressant therapies for people who are overweight or obese.

What are the new findings in your manuscript?

We found a dose-response relationship between body mass index (BMI) and incident depression. We also found some ambiguity over prescribing of antidepressants in adults who were overweight and obese.

How might your results change the direction of research or the focus of clinical practice?

We would like to see guidance on antidepressant prescribing specifically designed for people who are overweight and obese. We also recommend tailored service provision for people with overweight/obesity and depression to address both mood and behaviours.

Abstract

Objectives

To describe age and gender-specific incidence of depression, the dose-response relationship between body mass index (BMI) and risk of depression (Cox proportional hazards), and antidepressant drug prescribing in adults who are overweight or obese.

Methods

A retrospective electronic health record study using the Clinical Practice Research Datalink (CPRD) was conducted to identify overweight and obese adults (≥ 18 years) with incident depression (no prior depression diagnosis in their records), followed up from 2000–2019.

Results

Among 519,513 adults, incidence of depression was 9.2 per 1000 person-years and was higher in women and in 40–59 year old men who were severely obese. Compared with being overweight, the hazard of depression increased with each BMI category: from 1.13 (30–34 kg/m²; [95% CI] 1.10–1.16); 1.34 (35–39 kg/m²; 1.29–1.40); 1.51 (40–44 kg/m²; 1.41–1.61); to 1.67 (45–49 kg/m²; 1.48–1.87), attenuating at BMI 50+ kg/m² (1.54; 2.91–1.84).

Antidepressants were prescribed as first-line therapy in two-thirds (66.3%) of cases. Prescriptions for fluoxetine reduced over time (20.4% [2000]; 8.8% [2018]) and prescriptions for sertraline increased (4.3% [2000]; 38.9% [2018]).

Conclusions

We recommend guidance on antidepressant drug prescribing and specific services for people with obesity and depression that address both symptoms and behaviours.

Introduction

Obesity is a leading cause of death globally (1, 2). A contributing factor is the co-existence of depression, which is more common in people who are overweight or obese and contributes substantially to healthcare expenditure and burden (3, 4, 5). Whilst the relationship between obesity and depression is complex, evidence suggests that being overweight or obese increases the risk of being diagnosed with depression (6, 7).

Epidemiological research suggests that prevalence of depression is about twice as common in women (8, 9) and decreases as a person becomes older (10). Incident depression follows a similar pattern, with the gender gap being particularly apparent between the ages of 20–49 years (11, 12). In people who are overweight and obese, these patterns are similar, but there does not appear to be a disproportionate disadvantage by gender or age when compared with normal weight (6).

The dose-response relationship between obesity and incident depression has not yet been fully quantified. Existing data suggest that a dose-response effect exists for overweight (body mass index; BMI 25–29 kg/m²) and obesity (BMI≥30kg/m²), with a 27% and 55% increased risk of depression, respectively, compared with those of normal weight (6), and that this effect may be stronger in men (13). Despite this, to our knowledge there have been no studies that have explored this relationship in more depth by quantifying risk of clinical depression as BMI increases beyond traditional obesity thresholds (BMI≥30kg/m²). This is important as prevalence of obesity is rising and both obesity and depression are associated with poor outcomes (14, 15, 16), with each 5kg/m² increase in BMI beyond 25kg/m² incurring a 21% increased risk of death (17).

Despite the high prevalence of depression in people with obesity in the UK, there is no specific guidance on the management of depression in people who are overweight or obese, although there is guidance on the treatment of depression in the presence of chronic physical conditions (18). For physicians choosing to prescribe antidepressants, both traditional guidelines and those for people with physical health conditions recommend considering generic citalopram or sertraline as first-line therapies (18, 19). Physicians are asked to consider risk of bleeding, whereby selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs) should be avoided, or if the patient is at risk of suicide, whereby venlafaxine and tricyclic antidepressants (except lofepramine) should be avoided. Further, dosulepin should not be prescribed as a first-line therapy owing to increased risk of cardiovascular complications and toxicity. It is not clear whether or how physicians' prescribing patterns vary for people who are overweight or obese.

The goals of the present study were to (i) estimate the age and gender-specific incidence of depression in overweight/obese adults (≥ 18 years); (ii) estimate the dose-response relationship between BMI and risk of depression; and (iii) describe antidepressant drug prescribing for incident depression in overweight/obese adults.

Methods

Data sources

The reporting of this study followed the REporting of studies Conducted using observational Routinely-collected health Data (RECORD) (20) Checklist (Table S1). We used the Clinical Practice Research Datalink (CPRD GOLD; approved study protocol number: 18_311), an electronic database of more than 11.3 million patients from 674 general practice (GP) surgeries in the UK, which is broadly representative of the national population in terms of age, gender and ethnicity (21). Under the UK healthcare system, most of the UK population is registered at a single GP surgery, which is the first point-of-contact for health concerns. Data from the CPRD include anonymised patient information, clinical diagnoses, prescriptions, tests, and referrals to secondary care (including speciality).

Approximately 75% of practices in England participate in the CPRD linkage scheme, which allows linkage to hospital episode statistics (HES), deaths registrations from the Office for National Statistics (ONS) and the 2015 index of multiple deprivation (IMD), used to estimate socioeconomic status. We included practices that had agreed to data linkage only for this study because the second phase (not reported here) incorporated more in-depth follow up of patients who developed depression. All diagnostic and prescription (product) codes used in this study are reported in the supplementary material.

Study Design

This was a retrospective database study comprising adults aged 18 years or over who were overweight or obese between 1 January 2000 and 31 December 2016. Overweight/obesity was defined through Read codes and BMI measures ($BMI \geq 25\text{kg}/\text{m}^2$ or overweight/obese diagnosis [Table S2]).

Adult patients entered the cohort on the date of their first overweight/obese measurement/diagnosis from 1 January 2000, date the GP surgery was considered “up to standard” (using the CPRD’s quality criteria), or date the patient was registered for 12 months, whichever was latest. Patients exited the cohort at the date of first depression diagnosis, date of death, date leaving the practice, date of last practice update, or date of last CPRD update (21 January 2019), whichever came first.

Patients were included if they met the up-to-standard patient-level quality criteria set by the CPRD, had at least 12 months registration in the practice prior, and had data linkage available (approximately 75% of practices in England). Patients were excluded if they had: an overweight or obese diagnosis/measurement after death ($n=10$); an existing diagnosis of depression before cohort entry, date of registration with the practice or before the age of 18 years ($n=11,854$); or ever (before or after the index date) a diagnosis of psychotic disorders, bipolar disorder or dementia ($n=33,643$; Table S5). Patients were also excluded if they were prescribed an antidepressant before the index date ($n=275,562$; Table S4), had ever taken anticholinesterase medication ($n=3,231$; Table S6), or had taken antimania or antipsychotic medication before the date of depression diagnosis ($n=86,039$; Table S6).

Outcome

For the purposes of this study, incident depression was described as any new onset depression (i.e. no previous record of depression or antidepressant prescription) in patients' primary care record history up until the last available update (21 January 2019). First diagnoses of depression were identified using a set of a-priori defined Read codes used in previous research (22) (Table S3).

Statistical analysis

The characteristics of the entire population and antidepressants prescribed for incident depression were described. We calculated and plotted incidence rate of depression per 1000 person-years (and 95% Poisson confidence intervals) by age group and gender. Patients were followed up until first date of depression, leaving the practice, last practice update or last available CPRD update (21 January 2019), whichever came first. To explore the relationship between level of obesity and incident depression, we also stratified by obesity level (overweight diagnosis or BMI 25–29 kg/m²; obese diagnosis [Obese Class I/Obese Class II/Obesity] or BMI 30–39 kg/m²; severely obese diagnosis [Obese class III] or BMI 40+ kg/m²). A Cox proportional hazards model (using age as the time scale) was used to assess the dose-response relationship between BMI group and incident depression in relation to overweight (BMI 25–29 kg/m²; reference category).

Results

Baseline characteristics

Table 1 shows the baseline characteristics of the study sample (n=519,339). Average length of follow up was 6.2 years (range 0 – 19 years). There were more men (55.5%) than women. More than two-thirds were overweight, with 30.3% classified as obese or severely obese. The majority of the study population (88.7%) were white. Incident depression occurred in 6.2% of the sample, and around two-thirds (66.3%) of individuals were prescribed a first antidepressant at diagnosis. Of the sample who developed depression, 2.1% (n=693) were referred to psychiatric/mental health services on the same day; a further 3.8% (n=1,234) were referred without specifying type of secondary care.

Antidepressant use

The most common class of antidepressants prescribed at first diagnosis of depression were SSRIs (90% of all antidepressants prescribed). In particular, the most common antidepressants prescribed were citalopram, followed by fluoxetine, sertraline and escitalopram. Of the other antidepressants, mirtazapine (tetracyclic) and dosulepin (tricyclic) were the most commonly prescribed. A small proportion of individuals (0.2%, n=48) were prescribed two antidepressants simultaneously, most commonly amitriptyline (tricyclic) combinations followed by trazodone (atypical) combinations.

[Table 1 about here]

Figure 1 shows the proportion of individual antidepressants prescribed as first-line therapy for incident depression by calendar year. Antidepressants were not prescribed fairly consistently in approximately one-third of cases over time. For those remaining and prior to the publication of UK guidance in 2009, the most common antidepressants prescribed were fluoxetine and citalopram. Subsequent to 2009, prescriptions for fluoxetine as first-line therapy became less common (20.4% [in 2000], 19.2% [2009], 8.8% [2018]) and prescriptions for sertraline increased (4.3% [2000], 3.3% [2009], 38.9% [2018]). For other antidepressants, dosulepin and paroxetine were less commonly prescribed over time and there was a gradual rise in mirtazapine prescriptions.

Incident depression by age group, gender and obesity status

The overall incident rate in the study population was 9.2 (95% CI 9.1–9.8) per 1000 person-years (3.5 million person years at risk; median follow-up 6.2 years). Figure 2 shows the incidence rate of depression per 1000 person-years by age group and gender. Incidence of depression was more common in women and was highest in the youngest age group (18–29 years). The rate of incident depression was approximately 13 per 1000 person-years in men and 27 per 1000 person-years in women. Incidence of depression was lowest at 60–69 years, and increased thereafter.

Figure 3 and Figure 4 show the incidence rate of depression per 1000 person-years by age and obesity status for men and women, respectively. Incident depression was generally higher in people who were severely obese, with a dose-response effect across obesity categories. This was particularly apparent among men between the ages of 40 and 59 years, where the incidence of depression was 1.7–1.8 times higher (incidence rate ratio 1.8 [95% CI 1.5–2.1] for 40–49 years and 1.7 [1.4–2.1] for 50–59 years) among severely obese compared with overweight males.

In the Cox proportional hazards model, a clear dose-response relationship was observed between risk (hazard) of depression and BMI (Figure 5). Compared with the reference category of overweight (BMI 25–29 kg/m²), the hazard of depression increased in each BMI group category (HR 1.13 [1.10–1.16] for 30–34 kg/m²; 1.34 [1.29–1.40] for 35–39 kg/m²; 1.51 [1.41–1.61] for 40–44 kg/m²; and 1.67 [1.48–1.87] for 45–49 kg/m²), attenuating slightly at BMI 50+ kg/m² (HR 1.54 [1.29–1.89]).

Discussion

Overall, we have found that women and younger age groups who are overweight or obese are at the greatest risk of depression; moreover, there was a clear dose-response relationship between increasing BMI and risk of depression. First-line antidepressant prescribing for incident depression changed over time and largely aligned with UK guidance for people in the general population and in those with concurrent physical health conditions (18, 19).

To our knowledge, this is the first large cohort study that has quantified the incidence of depression in adults who are overweight and obese. The incidence of depression (9.2 per 1000 person-years) in our study was somewhat lower than other studies among adults in all BMI categories, which we attribute to the exclusion of people with bipolar disorder, psychotic disorders or dementia. In a large Danish study, Pedersen et al. reported an incidence rate (as estimated from the figure) that was 1.3–1.7 times higher than our estimates before the age of 60 and 3–5 times higher beyond this age (23). In a smaller study carried out in the Netherlands (N=5,618), the incidence of depression was 17.2 per 1000 person-years and, as before, did not decline as rapidly in the older age groups (24). The most similar cohort to our study was in people of all BMI categories included in the UK Health Improvement Network (THIN) primary care database. In this study, the incidence rate of depression was 13.9 per 1000 person-years and the age and gender-distribution was strikingly similar to our own but without the same exclusion criteria (11). The established relationship and overlaps in symptoms between dementia, psychotic disorders and bipolar affective disorders (25, 26, 27) mean that their exclusion from this study is likely to lower incidence rates, particularly in the older age groups where dementia and depression are prevalent.

A novel finding in this study is the increasing risk of clinically diagnosed depression for increasing BMI. Other studies have typically used BMI cut-offs to compare overweight (BMI 25–29) and obesity ($BMI \geq 30$) with normal weight (6), finding a dose-response relationship between the three categories. That risk of depression continues to increase with higher BMI in the obese category is clearly an important finding as both increasing BMI and depression are intrinsically linked with poor health outcomes (14, 15, 16, 17). The closest findings to ours were found in the HUNT Study of 74,332 adults (≥ 20 years) in Norway. In this study, odds of depression (as measured using the Hospital Anxiety and Depression Scale [HAD] (28)) increased linearly by 12% for each standard deviation increase in BMI (29). Our study substantially furthers this knowledge owing to its large sample size and consideration of time to new onset depression diagnosis. It also suggests that risk may not continue to be linear beyond $BMI \geq 45 \text{ kg/m}^2$, although we recognise that this may reflect the small sample size of this group and increased likelihood of mobility issues affecting GP surgery attendance.

Despite improvements in medical knowledge about the causes and mechanisms of depression, there is a clear gap in service provision and policy initiatives in this area. For example, in the UK, there are currently no services that offer pharmacological or psychological therapies that focus on obesity and mood. There is also a distinct lack of guidance for general practitioners, psychiatrists and psychologists for treating people who present with both obesity and depression. The co-occurrence of depression and obesity is clearly complex, but the psychological impact of being overweight and obese is believed to cause distress and depression (30), with dysregulated stress systems, unhealthy lifestyles, body image, physical health, binge eating and interpersonal effectiveness all playing a role (31, 32). Early interventions that help to break the cycle of depression and weight gain have the potential to dramatically improve quality of life and reduce significant complications in the future.

We found that women had an approximate two-fold increased risk of depression compared with men. This may partly reflect women's more frequent attendance at GP surgeries (33), leading to increased likelihood of being diagnosed with depression. However, numerous studies have also found that women are at a particular disadvantage for depressive disorders (9, 11, 23). Reasons for this are varied but the literature suggests that women are more likely to display atypical depressive features, including increased appetite, hypersomnia, low energy, pain and fatigue (34, 35). Physiological stress responses, hormones, and adverse experiences such as violence, abuse and discrimination may also play a contributory role (9, 36).

Despite incidence of depression being higher in women, the dose-response relationship between BMI and depression was particularly evident in men, mainly in the 40–59 year age group where there was a markedly higher risk of depression in the severely obese ($BMI \geq 40$) compared with overweight or obese. This is somewhat unusual given that the risk of depression generally lowers with age (10). A previous study carried out in the USA in 1,137 adults also found a stronger dose-response effect in men, with women only showing this effect in the younger age groups (13). It is possible that men who are severely obese in their 40s and 50s become depressed because they suffer more from mobility problems, interpersonal stress or discrimination. Whilst women tend to experience more weight-based discrimination than men, there is some evidence that gender differences are less apparent in people who are severely obese (37), which may explain our findings.

We have highlighted the lack of guidelines designed specifically for people with obesity and depression, but it is reassuring that both general and comorbid physical health population guidelines are being followed for people presenting with depression in primary care settings. However, it is notable that antidepressants associated with weight gain are still being prescribed as first-line therapies in this population (38). Further, the reduction in prescriptions for fluoxetine may be an unfortunate trend as it is associated with lower weight gain and even moderate weight loss compared with most other antidepressants (39, 40). Moreover, dosulepin, contraindicated as a first-line therapy from 2009 (18, 19), was still prescribed as late as 2016, and a small proportion ($n=48$; 0.1%) of individuals were prescribed more than one antidepressant as first-line treatment. As the majority of this latter group were prescribed amitriptyline and trazodone combinations, it is possible that these antidepressants were prescribed for other indications. Amitriptyline is commonly prescribed for musculoskeletal problems (41) and trazodone for agitation/insomnia (42). We were unable to find supporting diagnoses for these indications, but both antidepressants were prescribed in low doses (amitriptyline<25mg for all; trazodone 50–75 mg for all), which would support this. However, we are unable to explain the rationale for prescribing other combinations as first-line treatments, particularly SSRIs. We reiterate the urgent need for clear guidance in this area.

Limitations

The strength of this study is the large sample size of a representative population of adults in England. However, there are some limitations that should be considered. First, this study relies on retrospective electronic health records which are subject to inconsistent recording and coding. Of particular note, we only included people with known BMI measurement.

Complete BMI reporting in UK GP surgeries has improved over time and is known to be more common in older individuals, females, people of lower socioeconomic status, higher BMIs and in people with coexisting chronic conditions (43, 44), which suggest that the incidence of depression may be under-estimated in our study population. We also do not know when the individual became overweight/obese or depressed in this general practice population, only when they were measured/diagnosed. Similarly, both overweight and obesity have lower BMI threshold definitions for people of South Asian ethnicity because the equivalent BMI levels reflect a comparatively higher percentage of body fat than white populations (45). We did not take this into account because ethnicity was missing for almost two-thirds (65%) of individuals. We have not been able to explore other risk factors for depression in this population, such as marital status, which is known to be associated with depression (10). Similarly, we are unable to make any causal inferences in this retrospective cohort design. We are also limited to describing pharmacological interventions, which should not detract from the importance of psychological interventions on which we were unfortunately not able to report in this general practice sample.

Conclusions

We have found that new onset depression in overweight and obese individuals is a significant problem, particularly in women and younger age groups, with incidence of depression increasing with BMI in a proportionate manner. Whilst general practitioners in the UK generally follow NICE guidelines for antidepressant drug prescribing, there appears to be some ambiguity over first-line therapy choices for people with both obesity and depression. There is an urgent need for guidance on antidepressant drug prescribing for people who are overweight and obese. We also highlight the need for specific services that focus on both obesity and mood to address the complex issues that this vulnerable group of individuals face.

Where there was an obvious error (BMI change >20 kg/m²), we took the closest alternative measurement (n=191). We excluded patients with a BMI >60 kg/m² if there was no other indication in their record that this was correct or if their previous/subsequent BMI measurement indicated that they were of normal weight/underweight (n=184 in total)
